DEC 2011

TOUGH ENOUGH

By Greg Brooks. You know it's a lean year when everyone gets the same Christmas present, but no one who has anything to do with housing will mind: 2011 is almost over and that's as good a present as we could ask for.

Certainly the National Association of Realtors is ready for the new year. NAR just acknowledged that its monthly existing home sales reports have been inadvertently overstated for years now by about 15%. NAR has published revised sales data from 2007 forward, and insists the revisions don't affect median home prices or unsold inventory.

Time's headline summed up the reaction of the mainstream media: "Housing Downturn Was Worse Than We Thought." Maybe worse than you thought.

It's a safe bet Builders FirstSource won't mind seeing this year end, either. 2011 was supposed to be the year housing bounced back. It didn't, and after losing \$375 million (pretax) from 2007 through 2010, the company lost another \$46 million in the first three quarters of 2011.

In early December, BFS took out a \$160 million loan "secured by a first lien on substantially all of the Company's assets." CEO Floyd Sherman said the deal "positions us to take full advantage of the expected recovery in housing."

No doubt the recovery will come. The question is whether it'll come quickly enough.

But nobody – guaranteed, nobody – will be happier to put 2011 in the rear-view mirror than big box retailer Lowe's. It all began innocently enough when Lowe's, along with a dozen-odd other companies, bought ad time on a reality show called ALL-American Muslim.

The falafel hit the fan when the Florida Family Association (FFA) decided that televising the daily lives of middle-class Muslims from Dearborn, Mich. was propaganda designed “to manipulate Americans into ignoring the threat of jihad.” FFA called for a boycott of the show’s advertisers, which caused Lowe’s to promptly cancel its ads.

Which promptly sparked a second backlash from Muslim, Christian, and Jewish religious leaders; activist groups; and 32 members of Congress. Outraged that Lowe’s rolled over for what they believe is an extremist hate group, they’ve gathered 200,000 signatures demanding an apology – and they’re calling for their own boycott. Meanwhile, ad time on ALL-American Muslim is sold out.

For its part, Lowe’s has remained steadfastly in the fetal position, waiting for the next shoe to drop. Will pro- and anti-Muslim groups get together to boycott us? Will they buy furring strips for protest signs from Depot? Would they buy from us if we gave them a discount? (They’d save gas and time, too.)

Here’s shoe No. 1: Turns out the Florida Family Association isn’t a hate “group” after all. It’s apparently one guy with a Web site and a 35,000-name email list who made his living stirring up outrage over gay people on TV until he realized jihad was sexier.

Shoe No. 2: FFA’s founder and sole card-carrying member has an unlikely ally in a Muslim-American columnist for the liberal news blog The Daily Beast. She says advertisers should boycott ALL-American Muslim, but not because of Islamophobia. “We need a Cosby Show for Muslims, but we ended up with something more like a Muslim Jersey Shore. It’s simply a terrible program.”

Go to the dictionary and look up the word “punked.” You will find the Lowe’s logo.

So will 2012 will be better than 2011? Citigroup publishes what it calls an Economic Surprise Index, which is basically a report card on economists. When the index is zero it means economic conditions turned out exactly as predicted. Positive numbers mean things were better than economists thought they would be and negative numbers mean they turned out worse.

U.S. housing data compiled by:

Looking at the five-year index (p. 2), the only conclusion you can draw is that literally everything comes as a surprise to economists.

Including this month's surge in housing starts. Most of the first half of 2011 sucked, but YoY starts in September, October, and November were up 10.9%, 17.0%, and 27.6% respectively.

Yes, we could still get pantsed by Europe. Everyone is worried about China now, too. But barring that, lending should continue to normalize and unemployment should continue to fall. Home sales and housing starts should grow as a result.

So far so good, but some dealers seem to be wondering when the market will recover to a point where the pressure goes away. Chances are it never will. Instead, those extraordinary measures you took to survive the downturn will become the new baseline.

Here's one example: ProSales is distributing a white paper by consultant Ruth Kellick-Grubbs on what she calls OTIF – “on time in full” order fulfillment. Measuring your OTIF percentage (not to mention improving it) indisputably makes sense, but it's a little like showing up for work sober: Customers won't give you extra credit for it.

It's a competitive weapon to the extent that you can use it to cast doubt on your competitors' performance. That puts pressure on them to measure OTIF, and like drug-testing, eventually everyone has to do it.

Rising standards make life more difficult but they also create opportunities. Builders have their own equivalents of OTIF, and if you can identify them, you know what the hot buttons will be.

Two possibilities keep popping up. The first is energy efficiency. One in four new homes built in 2010 was Energy Star-qualified, and you can't read an article about a hot new sub-division or a top-10 trend without bumping up against net zero energy homes (that produce as much energy as they consume).

The 2012 energy code mandates 15% greater efficiency than IECC 2009, the biggest increase yet. While it'll take time for states to adopt it, no one believes the rules will ever get looser. It's time to start boning up on building science.

The second is Lean construction. Lean building guru Scott Sedam can find builders \$5,000 extra profit on every home just by eliminating waste – and without squeezing suppliers' margins. You can, too, if you know where to look.

The recovery may be as challenging as the recession, but most dealers (or their parents or grandparents) have been through it multiple times. If you're tough enough to have survived this long, you're tough enough to go the distance.

Happy Holidays and here's to a successful 2012 – regardless of the numbers. TM
